No charge of bad baseball may be preferred against the Robins, for they were outmatched by Lee Meadows, who pitched a beautiful game of ball. but for some reason he found the amateur championship a tough barrier for several years. He failed to qualify in 1913 at Garden City and again in 1914 at Ekwanok, despite the fact that he had been playing the soundest sort of golf before he came to the borders of these two championship affairs. His failure to qualify was a decided puzzle, as he isn't a golfer of the nervous,

The Southern champion finally broke through or over the hoodoed rampart at Detroit last fall, and after Ouimet had been dethroned Whitney was favored as a finalist. He romped through his first three matches, but on the fourth day, against John G. Anderson, Whitney's short game deserted him with a rush. He was driving well and playing his irons nicely, but his putting went very badly to seed.

Here is one instance—at the short seventh hole, in the afternoon play, Whitney was 'B down. His mashie shot here dropped within seven feet of the pin. Anderson was almost over the green, thirty-five feet away. The latter pin. Anderson was almost over the green, thirty-five feet away. The latter laid his approach put within two feet of the hole. Whitney, going for his 2, over-putted far enough to leave himself an unplayable stymic, and so lost the hole. To lose a hole to a 3 where one has a seven-foot put for a 2 is at had had a wonderful chance to match his fine long game against Bob Gardner's for the leading title of the countryside.

Has His Chance.

An iron player of Nelson Whitney's fine ability has a first-class chance at Merion. Now that he has finally broken through his an iron shot with greater firmness or with keener professional crispness, and if Whitney can stand the strain of a six-day grind he will bear constant watching by the best in the field.

The Southern star proved recently at the National that he was coming upon his best game at top speed. It will be in the main a matter of putting.
